

Uganda's 'social media tax' condemned

By Louise Marsland

1 Jun 2018

Uganda is in the news today across the globe for what is being called a "social media tax" on social media users in the East African country, which has in the past imposed draconian laws that curb press freedom and freedom of speech.

© qukavia 123RF

In essence, Uganda's parliament has passed a bill levying a "social media tax" on anyone who uses social networking and messaging apps and platforms like WhatsApp, Facebook and Twitter. The tax comprises a daily fee of about 200 shillings (5 US cents or R0.66), according to Engadget. The new law is due to go into effect on July 1, 2018, but it has not yet been made clear how the often-repressive Ugandan government will monitor its citizens or actually collect the tax.

Engadget terms it a "strange way to regulate the use of social media" within a country: "It's possible there may also be a political angle here, as President Yoweri Musaveni suspended access to social media apps and platforms in the run-up to the country's 2016 presidential elections."

South Africa's Times Live reports that opponents of the law say it is aimed at curbing criticism of President Museveni (73), who has been in power since 1986 – long before the advent of the internet and social media... Opposition critics have in the past been charged for allegedly insulting him in Facebook posts.

Previously, a junior finance minister said the tax would be levied daily by mobile phone operators on each SIM card used to access any of the targeted social media platforms.

BBC reports that the Ugandan President pushed for the law: "He wrote a letter to Finance Minister Matia Kasaija insisting that the revenue collected by the social media tax would help the country 'cope with consequences of olugambo' [gossiping]".

According to Times Live, there was no immediate comment from mobile operators or social media platforms, but human rights advocates have condemned the move: "It (tax) is a new tool of stifling free expression and citizen organising that has been beyond the control of the state," said Nicholas Opiyo, a Kampala-based lawyer who also heads a local rights organisation. It's intended to curtail the ever increasing central role of social media in political organising, he said.

Social media have become an important political tool in Uganda for both the ruling party and the opposition, the BBC correspondent says. Access to platforms was shut during presidential elections in 2016. President Museveni insisted at the time that it was done to "stop spreading lies", according to BBC.

ABOUT LOUISE MARSLAND

Louise Burgers (previously Marsland) is Founder/Content Director: SOURCE Content Marketing Agency. Louise is a Writer, Publisher, Editor, Content Strategist, Content/Media Trainer. She has written about consumer trends, brands, branding, media, marketing and the advertising communications industry in SA and across Africa, for over 20 years, notably, as previous Africa Editor: Bizcommunity.com; Editor: Bizcommunity Media/Marketing SA; Editor-in-Chief: AdVantage magazine; Editor: Marketing Mx magazine; Editor: Progressive Retailing magazine; Editor: BusinessBrief magazine; Editor: FMOG Files newsletter. Web: www.sourceagency.co.za.

▪ Teaching trade: the importance of empowering the female entrepreneur - 17 Dec 2019

▪ New monetisation models for media are needed - 16 Dec 2019

▪ #AfricaCom: The many VOD markets - 25 Nov 2019

▪ #AfricaCom: TV content future will be shaped by OTT - 20 Nov 2019

▪ Africa's growth rests on economic empowerment of women - 1 Nov 2019

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>